

Gregory (Greg) Wolcott is the Director, Individual Freedom and Free Markets, at the John Templeton Foundation, where he works with scholars and practitioners pursuing projects that explore classical liberal principles and their applications. He is interested in asking how freedom might foster space for people to flourish both as individuals and as members of communities, and in his own work he has examined this question by focusing on business and entrepreneurship, the moral foundations of markets, virtues and vices, the possibility of vocations, and the insights of thinkers such as Aristotle, Plato, Adam Smith, F.A. Hayek, Deirdre McCloskey, and Edmund Phelps, among others.

Greg previously served as a faculty liaison and as a program director at the Institute for Humane Studies at George Mason University. These roles afforded him the opportunity to support, including through grantmaking, students and scholars across disciplines and to build collaborative relationships with think tanks and other nonprofits in the pursuit of free and flourishing societies. He has also taught philosophy at the undergraduate and graduate level at various colleges and universities, including Saint Mary's College of California where he was an Assistant Professor of Business Ethics in the Department of Organizations and Responsible Business. He obtained his PhD in philosophy from Loyola University Chicago and his BA in philosophy from The Catholic University of America. Greg has published scholarly articles and reviews in multiple academic journals.
